

Date Submitted: 5/2/2020

Author: Mohit Masand

“The opportunity of spending time together far surpasses the inconvenience. I have lived my toddler’s childhood, more than I ever did in the previous 2.5 years of his life.”

“This pandemic has completely altered my family's life. We had to cancel our trip to India in March and our offices & day-care also closed around the same time. This month and a half since the closures, locked in with my family, has brought more positives than negatives. Yes; it's hard to work with a toddler at home; a story of which is narrated in the attached document. However, the opportunity of spending time together far surpasses the inconvenience. I have lived my toddler's childhood, more than ever I did in the previous 2.5 years of his life. We read stories together, learn with flashcards, go for walks, and even sing together. My wife, I, and Evaan (my toddler) got to sing a song together. It's quite an achievement, given that he's just over 2.5 years old. I have found time to read, sing, cook, and meditate. We are certainly quite anxious about our parents in India, but we have come to terms with the fact that we (or our anxiety) can't control this situation. So, we are trying to stay calm and make the most of this time.”

